Red, white and blue young leaves: an anti-herbivore defense

Abstract

In rainforests, the young leaves of many species are white, red or blue, and have low levels of chlorophyll throughout leaf expansion. We examined the implications of this delayed greening pattern for photosynthesis and herbivory in gap and understory species. Species with delayed greening have 5 times less chlorophyll, absorb 75% less light, and have significantly lower carbon gain during leaf development. They also have lower concentrations of nitrogen and energy-rich compounds such as rubisco, light harvesting proteins, and lipids associated with the chloroplast. As a consequence, fewer resources are lost to herbivores during the vulnerable stage of development before leaves toughen and become better protected from herbivores. A cost-benefit analysis shows that because of a tradeoff between carbon gain through photosynthesis and carbon loss to herbivores, white leaves cost less to make than green leaves under low-light conditions in the understory. At higher light levels, the advantages of photosynthesis outweigh the losses to herbivores, and green leaves are more effective. A survey of gap and understory plants confirms that delayed greening is overwhelmingly found in shade-tolerant species. Correlations among delayed greening and other young leaf defenses will be discussed.

Next Week

Tuesday, November 26, noon seminar speaker will be Stanley Heckadon, STRI Research Associate.
