Publications of the United States National Museum

In these series are published original articles and monographs dealing with the collections and work of the Museum and setting forth newly acquired facts in the fields of Anthropology, Biology, Geology, History, and Technology. Copies of each publication are distributed to libraries and scientific organizations and to specialists and others interested in the different subjects.

The Proceedings, begun in 1878, are intended for the publication, in separate form, of shorter papers. These are gathered in volumes, octavo in size, with the publication date of each paper recorded in the table of contents of the volume.

In the Bulletin series, the first of which was issued in 1875, appear longer, separate publications consisting of monographs (occasionally in several parts) and volumes which are collected works on related subjects. Bulletins are either octavo or quarto in size, depending on the needs of the presentation. Since 1902 papers relating to the botanical collections of the Museum have been published in the Bulletin series under the heading Contributions from the United States National Herbarium.

MUSEUM OF HISTORY AND TECHNOLOGY
Acknowledgments

To the following institutions I extend thanks for their courtesy in permitting me to reproduce prints in their collections: National Gallery of Art (no. 40), The Metropolitan Museum of Art (nos. 30, 35), Detroit Institute of Art (nos. 17, 22, 27, 36), Library of Congress (nos. 25, 26), University of Nebraska Art Galleries (nos. 28, 31), Honolulu Academy of Arts (no. 7).

I wish also to thank the following museums and art galleries for lending Hassam prints for examination: Washington County Museum of Fine Arts, Hagerstown, Maryland; University of Nebraska Art Galleries; Honolulu Academy of Arts; Detroit Institute of Arts; and the Atlanta Art Association.

In addition, I am grateful to the late Henry Kleemann, who provided clues to the location of several unique examples of the artist’s work and biographical information about Hassam, whom he knew personally; and to George C. Miller, of New York City, for other information about Hassam’s prints.

Finally, to Jacob Kainen, curator of the division of graphic arts, and P. W. Bishop, head curator of the department of arts and manufactures, United States National Museum, I am indebted for generous criticism and suggestions.
The Lithographs of Childe Hassam
Selected Bibliography

CORTISSOZ, ROYAL. The etchings and dry-points of Childe Hassam, N.A. New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1925.

VOLLMER, HANS. Childe Hassam. (P. 387 in vol. 2 of Allgemeines lexikon der bildenden künstler; des XX. jahrhunderts, Leipzig: E. A. Seemann, 1955.)

As an artist, Childe Hassam (1859–1935) needs no introduction, but it is not widely known that he was one of the leaders in the revival of lithography as an art medium in America.

This movement is usually associated with the names of Arthur B. Davies, Bolton Brown, George Bellows, Albert Sterner, and Joseph Pennell, and it remains a mystery why Hassam’s contributions, which are indeed important, have so far been neglected by the catalogers.

The lithographs of his contemporaries Davies, Pennell, and Bellows are well known and have been fully cataloged, but during the more than four decades that have elapsed since Hassam produced his last lithograph (1918) no separate study of his prints has appeared. In fact, although his work in other media has been fully described, these are scarcely mentioned in biographical or critical studies. The by-passing of a group of prints that are to be found in many public collections throughout the United States cannot be attributed to Hassam's obscurity. He was a prominent academician. In his lifetime he won probably more awards than any other American artist of his period. This is the first descriptive catalog of Hassam's lithographs.

Frederick Childe Hassam (pronounced Has'sam, the last name is a corruption of the old English name of Horsham) was born in Boston on October 17, 1859. He was the son of a prosperous Boston merchant and avid antiquarian, among whose sizable collection of antiques he spent his early youth. His formal art training began in Boston under I. M. Gaugengigl. After working for a short period as an illustrator and painter, he continued his studies at the Academie Julian in Paris under Boulanger and Lefebvre until 1883. During his five years in France, Hassam was unquestionably influenced by the prismatic dissolutions of Monet, an influence that was to make him one of the leading exponents of American impressionism, or "luminism," as it was termed in this country.

On his return from Europe, Hassam continued to work both as a painter and an illustrator. To the readers of such periodicals as Babyland, Wide Awake, Saint Nicholas, Harper's, Scribner's, and The Century, he became as well-known as to gallery-goers. In 1898 he helped to found and was a member of "The Ten," a group of rebels, composed of such artists as Dewing, Twachtman, Tarbell, J. A. Weir, Metcalf, Reid, Benson, J. R. DeCamp, and E. E. Simmons, who opposed the conservative traditions of the American Academy.

It was toward the end of his career, after Hassam had established an international reputation as a painter, that he began to produce, during 1917 and 1918, some 45 lithographs for the most part executed in a broad manner.

As the result of the limited market for lithographic prints in the 1920's this work, all of which was printed by George C. Miller of New York City, realized only negligible sales between 1920 and 1934. In the latter year Kleemann Galleries became sole publishers of Hassam's lithographs. Henry Kleemann, in a preface to the price list he issued in that year stated that these were typical of Hassam's New York and New England scenes, and he invoked the artist's well-publicized reputation as an impressionist:

... witness his well known superb etchings and paintings, of Long Island, the New England countryside, of New York and of many figure subjects. You will find this same typical subject matter represented in his lithographic work.

Despite Hassam's popularity, the lithographs failed commercially, and at the request of the artist's widow in 1940, the remaining prints were distributed among public collections throughout the country.

Hassam's lithographs contain, in addition to elements of impressionism,\(^1\) some qualities allied to expressionism, two art movements whose aims were essentially in opposition. Most of his landscape lithographs were completed out-of-doors, and Hassam developed, as did the impressionists, a technique of rough notation for simplifying and achieving rapidly the effects of \(^1\) French impressionism, primarily a painting movement with almost no representation in sculpture, heightened the key of the Barbizon school palette, as used by Millet and Rousseau, in order to achieve intensified atmospheric qualities, and often allowed the eye itself to mix the colors after they were applied. German expressionism, which placed heavy emphasis on the print media, derived much of its energy not only from medieval art and 15th-century woodcuts, but from the primitive and folk arts, while these were still only the concern of the professional ethnologist. African wood carving, with its powerful simplification of form, was a particular inspiration for the expressionists.

detail without actually rendering them. This can be seen especially in Afternoon Shadows (no. 42). Stylistically his prints reveal the heavy influence of Whistler, whom he admired. His lithograph Virginia (no. 10) shows strong resemblances in composition to Whistler’s etching Annie Seated; his The Spar Shop, Gloucester (no. 23) shows similar affinity with Whistler’s Wheelright. Yet as an impressionist Hassam was unable, temperamentally, to accept the soft looseness and sensuality associated with Monet and Renoir. In draughtsmanship his lithographs are more akin to expressionism than to the diaphanous nuances of impressionism.

In certain of the lithographs such as French Cruiser (no. 13) he emphasized form and minimized attention to surface phenomena and the study of light, and in such prints he came close to German expressionism, a movement to which he voiced violent antipathy. Other lithographs reveal Hassam’s use of crayon and tusche in powerful staccato strokes and bold slashes to produce vibrant patterning. Indeed, Broad Curtain (no. 29), The Lithographer (no. 9), Storm King (no. 45), and Nude (no. 38) show none of the impressionists’ concern for atmospheric conditions or lighting, but reveal rather the flat, shadowless, monumental patterns of expressionism.

Storm King, a heavy, somber, introspective treatment of the well-known stretch of the Hudson River near West Point, achieves its strength through lithotint washes laid on the stone in rude strokes like those of a painter. The water is represented by the stark white of the paper, an area intercepted only by the suggestion of a ship. Adjacent to this white area the rich, black mountain masses form a middle ground over which loom washes of grey storm clouds executed in nervous, erratic strokes of tusche.
In its range and depth of expression it is strikingly modern, even in comparison with prints by present-day abstractionists. Viewed apart from the other lithographs, Storm King would not be recognized immediately as the work of Childe Hassam; in conception and outlook it is more concerned with style and handling than with choice of pictorial content, with the 20th rather than the 19th century.

The personal world of expressionism is also strongly evidenced in French Cruiser. Stone Fences, Land of Nod (no. 18) bears a striking resemblance to Erich Heckel’s expressionist drypoint Fjord Landscape,2 executed in 1924, a style also in evidence to a lesser degree in such prints as The Lithographer, The Little School House, Land of Nod (no. 19), Thunderstorm (no. 26), and The Wild Cherry Tree (no. 37).

Finally, another quality, although not so apparent, colors the fabric of Hassam’s work in all media, a curious, indefinable archaism that echoes older civilizations and primitive forms. Such treatment in modified form can best be seen in the stiffness of the figures in the lithographs Virginia and The Wild Cherry Tree, and it also manifests itself in the faint smile on the woman’s lips in Red Cross Nurse, an expression often associated with archaic Greek sculpture. This quality also appears in the figures in Hassam’s etchings Mary Mullane, Girl in a Modern Gown, and the timeless Apollo-like treatment of the face in his etched portrait of Helen Burke.

Without exception all previous studies of Hassam have regarded him as an impressionist and his reputation has now been solidly established in this tradition. Among those who have so regarded him are such writers and critics as Royal Cortissoz, Ernest Haskell, Walter Pach, and Frank Weitenkampf.

Says A. E. Gallatin³:

Mr. Hassam is not only the greatest exponent in America of the teachings of Impressionism, possessed of a very sensitive color vision, but his work, executed in black and white, is also very distinguished. . . .

and Oliver W. Larkin⁴ remarked that—

. . . when Crumbling Idols [Hamlin Garland's novel championing Impressionism in America] appeared, Twachtman had become the Monet of the icebound Hudson, and Hassam the Sisley of Madison Avenue in the Spring.

Yet among Hassam's lithographs, only a half dozen—Afternoon Shadows (no. 42), Camouflage (no. 8), Colonial Church, Gloucester (no. 41), Haskell Street (no. 25), Inner Harbor (no. 16), and Plum Street, Gloucester (no. 28)—are clearly and unequivocally impressionistic. A similar number, previously mentioned, are equally in the expressionist tradition, and the bulk of the remainder combine elements of both styles.

It will be recalled that the lithographs were the product of the mature years of Hassam's career and it is interesting to observe that the experimentation, if such it was, did not enter to the same extent into his paintings and etchings of the same period.

Although these lithographs have been unwarrantably neglected, they probably constitute Hassam's most original body of work.

Catalog

The majority of the lithographs were drawn on transfer paper and transferred both to zinc plates and stones. Only the lithotints, numbered 5, 9, 13, 29, and 45, were done directly on stone. The majority were printed on China paper although other kinds, including pages from old books, were used.

The lithographs are arranged in their apparent order of execution, as indicated by the date on the print. Under dimensions, which are of the printed areas only, height precedes width, as usual, but fractions of an inch are given to the right of the decimal in sixteenths rather than hundredths of an inch. The dimensions are followed by the size of the edition, after which all inscriptions, ciphers, and signatures are given and located. Kleemann's numbers, based on his price list of 1934, are included.

In addition to the Smithsonian's United States National Museum (USNM) and National Gallery of Art (NGA), the permanent collections of other public and private institutions in which Hassam's lithographs can be found, all in the United States with the exception of the Bezalel National Museum, Jerusalem, are identified by the abbreviations set forth below:
